Both were accused by their enemies of great moral crimes and turpitude; and both, in the main, unjustly. It is one of the sad truths concerning warfare, but no less a truth, that in playlives of millions are in question. The sin lies in playing the game at all, not in the details or the practice of the play. Both these great men were stern and unrelenting in carrying out the lines which they held it true policy to lay down; neither, so far as history shows, was tainted in the least degree by anything resembling personal cruelty. Both have been accused of faithlessness-a charge never in any case to be much regarded, as brought between nations; for nations are ever prompt to declaim loudly, when the losers, against deeds, the like of which themselves commit readily when the winners. In the case of Hannibal, the Ro-Punic faith is to this day the proverb for entire faithlessness. Had the French writers alone made the world's annals of the late great struggle, "perfidious Albion" had gone down a by-word to all ages. Had ness of Napoleon would have become proverbial with
